

What has drifted, and what still matters

When mood drops, life narrows. The things that gave your days shape, the people, the interests, the small routines, quietly fall away.

That narrowing can be part of how depression works, not a sign of who you are. This audit is a way to see what has drifted, and to look for a direction back, even before motivation returns. You do not need to have read anything else first; everything you need is on these two pages.

i Useful alongside therapy, not a substitute for it. Nothing here is scored, and an honest, partial audit is more useful than a complete, tidy one.

THE AREAS THIS LOOKS ACROSS

a whole life, not one problem

Relationships

family, friends, the people close to you

Work, study or contribution

what you do, paid or unpaid

Health & body

movement, sleep, eating, self-care

Play & creativity

fun, hobbies, rest, things just for you

Growth & learning

curiosity, skills, who you are becoming

Community & belonging

connection beyond your close circle

Depression does not always empty all of these at once. Seeing them side by side can show where life has narrowed most, and where there is still something to step back toward. Page 2 has a row for each, plus one for anything that is yours alone.

WHAT WE MEAN BY "WHAT MATTERED"

- A direction, not a goal. How you want to live, not a box to tick. You never finish a value, so you can always turn back toward one.
- Seen in small things. A phone call, a walk, a meal made for someone. You do not have to change your life to live a value a little.
- Yours, not borrowed. What genuinely matters to you, not what you think should. An honest answer beats a tidy one.
- Still there when faded. What mattered before can still matter underneath. That is what can make a faded value findable again.

WHY THE GAP IS THE USEFUL PART

The space between what mattered and what life looks like now is not a scorecard. It is a map. The widest gaps can point to where re-engaging, in a small way, might be worth trying first, and a step toward a value can come before the motivation to take it (Stein et al., 2021).

HOW TO USE IT

- 1 Go area by area
Take one at a time, in any order. Skip any that do not fit you.
- 2 Name then and now
A few words each, in your own words.
Honest, not tidy.
- 3 Find the widest gaps
Not failures. They show where one small step back could be worth starting.

STUCK FOR A FIRST STEP? KEEP IT SMALL

- Text one person back
- Do one thing you used to enjoy, even if it feels flat
- Step outside for five minutes
- Open the curtains and make the bed

A step counts even if it is tiny, and even if it does nothing for your mood today. The point is turning back toward the area, not fixing it. Small and done beats big and imagined.

REMEMBER Drift is one way depression narrows life, not a verdict on you. What mattered before can still matter underneath, and you can turn back toward it one small step at a time, before you feel ready.

Your values audit

One life area per row.

A few words per cell, and leave any cell or row blank. The gap between what mattered and what it looks like now is the useful part, not a failure to fix. The areas below are a starting set; use the last row for anything else.

WHAT ONE ROW MIGHT LOOK LIKE

LIFE AREA	WHAT MATTERED HERE	WHAT IT LOOKS LIKE NOW	ONE SMALL STEP BACK
EXAMPLE Relationships	Seeing two close friends most weeks; feeling part of things	Have not replied to messages in a month; mostly alone	Send one short text to one friend
Relationships family, friends, the people close to you
Work, study or contribution what you do, paid or unpaid
Health & body movement, sleep, eating, self-care
Play & creativity fun, hobbies, rest, things just for you
Growth & learning curiosity, skills, who you are becoming
Community & belonging connection beyond your close circle
Something else that matters:

For use alongside therapy, not as a substitute. The audit gives you and a clinician something concrete to start from. It is for finding direction, not for closing the gap on your own. A blank area can mean a value is still there but contact has dropped, or that it never quite fit you. Both are worth knowing.

WHEN YOU HAVE FILLED WHAT YOU CAN

Bring it to a first conversation, or just sit with what you notice.

The widest gaps are useful information whether or not you book a session. If you would like to talk them through, the Meet and Greet is a short call to see if we are the right fit.

MEET AND GREET

- Free
- 15 minutes
- Online or in-person
- No obligation